she startled Clerk Pollock and others in the office, for they thought it was an Easter feast, but she said it was some food that she had received from a "friend," and she suspected that it was poisoned.

The facts were that the woman had received the pudding as a present from a roomer in the floor above, and that she had kept it over one day, and then discovered that it looked green. Then her suspicious were aroused, and she went to the office of the Chief of Police and made a complaint.

The pudding was sent to the office of the coroner, who analyzed it and found that there was nothing dangerous in the compound.
